

We use cookies to personalise content, target and report on ads, to provide social media features and to analyse our traffic. For more information see our Cookie Policy.

Fès: Marrakesh's quieter, timeless little sister

The 1,200-year-old Moroccan city has that captivating sense of being at a crossroads: of cultures and of time

© Sat, Jun 22, 2019, 06:00

Gemma Tipton

The medina, Fès el Bali, is said to be the largest car-free urban area in the world.

Dusk is falling, and we're sitting on the rooftop of the Riad Fès, sipping Moroccan wine, as calls to prayer echo across the surrounding hills. Below us, the Fès medina spreads out, a chaotic warren of narrow streets and rambling alleys. Little by little, as we sip, lights come on and the medina's character changes.

Founded more than 1,200 years ago, in 789, the medina, Fès el Bali, is said to be the largest car-free urban area in the world. It is also a Unesco World Heritage Site. Dive down during the daytime and discover a street devoted to silks, one to carpets, another to books, yet another to fruits. There you can choose the sweetest of figs, become flummoxed at the range of olives, and lured around the corner by the waft of spices.

The lobby of the Riad Fès.

In the meat section, sprigs of coriander are tied at the nostrils of a butchered camel, as if the dead beast might still balk at the smell of fish from the nearby mongers. This is not even the most pungent part of the medina. That honour goes to the Chouara Tannery. Built in the 11th century, it is the largest of three in the city.

It is hard not to think of the camel and its coriander as I am handed a bunch of mint to sniff, in counterbalance to the aromas rising from vast stone vats in which leathers are steeping to soften. They are filled, I'm told, with a mixture of cow urine, quicklime, pigeon guano, salt and water. My mint seems an insignificant barrier, and yet the scene is so fascinating I quickly forget the messages coming from my nose.

The vats are richly hued receptacles, ready to give colour to the leather. There is poppy red, henna orange, indigo blue.

Other vats are richly hued receptacles, ready to give colour to the leather. There is poppy red, henna orange, indigo blue. The hot sun dries everything. You watch from the balconies of surrounding leather stores, where you'll be offered everything from jackets to bags, footstools to slippers. Yes, you're assured, it's all made here, naturally dyed. I wonder at a peacock blue jacket, but decide to go along with the romance of it all. If you're so taken, don't forget to bargain for your prize.

Mint turns up again in the form of delicious sweet tea. After a couple of days it becomes unthinkable to not drink it, and even more unthinkable to not drink it from pretty tea glasses, poured from silver teapots. Everywhere you turn in the medina there's something else to see, another surprise.

Anonymous doorways open up to vast palaces, or smaller homes. More than 100,000 people live in the 2.2sq km space. Our guide tells us that this living, cheek by jowl, creates a strong sense of community. We pause in a square where copper workers are beating out pots. Despite the incredible age of the medina, and its layers of constant history and use, it's pleasingly clean and well kept. Millions are being spent on its ongoing restoration and refurbishment, a project that began a decade ago.

World's oldest library

Here is the site of Khizanat al-Qarawiyyin, believed to be the oldest library in the world. It, and its adjacent university, were founded by a woman, Fatima al-Fihri, in the 9th century. In 2016 it reopened after years of restoration, at a time when other Islamic libraries, such as that in Mosul in Iraq, were attacked and burned by Islamic State militants. In such an environment, Morocco seems to tread a careful line.

A fish stall at the medina.

For example: there's the wine we're drinking in this predominantly Islamic country. It's a delicious Volubilia Rouge; wine-making flourished in Morocco, also in testament to the French colonial heritage, until European import quotas were introduced; but it has recently rallied again. The sale of alcohol is prohibited only to Muslims, and it's not unusual to see headscarfed women sip soft drinks alongside other friends enjoying cocktails. This is just one example of how this beguiling city manages its mix of cultures and mingled histories, and which makes it such a fascinating place to visit.

In many ways, Fès seems like Marrakesh's quieter little sister. Despite actually being larger, and older than that flashier city, and Morocco's imperial city, Fès is a calmer spot. And in the medina, there's a sense of timelessness to it all, and a feeling that it is, for now, still untouched by the worst depredations of global tourism.

One of the many food stalls at the medina.

Leave the medina, and you're stepping right back into the 21st century with a bang. There's the noise of cars and motor scooters, a large Carrefour supermarket, a McDonald's. It's wrong to expect people, who make their lives in what also happen to be picturesque tourist destinations, to live in time-capsule theme parks, but it still feels jarring after a day spent enjoying the absence of such "amenities".

Another world

At night, the medina is another world. After an epic dinner at the Riad Fès, a beautifully restored palace which, despite being in the medina, is an oasis of elegant charm, I fancied a walk. And so we wander down the now quiet lanes, finding new things to see at every turn.

With the shops and stalls shuttered, you can drink in the rich carvings and plasterwork, the tiling and gold leaf, the wooden bar across a lane – set at a height to prevent animals from reaching the holiest centre. Some alleys are so narrow, just a strip of night sky appears overhead, but lanterns illuminate. There are many places in the world in which I wouldn't feel safe exploring in a small, clearly foreign group after dark, but Fès, it seems, isn't one of them.

So beguiled are we, that we're very late getting back, navigating through the maze of streets by gradient – we know we're staying up the hill, so we stick to ascending and, sure enough, we start to recognise landmarks.

The next day, after a yearning glance at the Riad Fès shaded gardens and outdoor pool, we're off to the Hotel Sahrai in the newer part of town. Here, we're rewarded with an infinity pool, the Jungle rooftop bar, and an exceptionally soothing massage at the Givenchy spa. Soon the grit of the medina, and the feel of its hills on the backs of my legs are smoothed away.

So is it Fès or Fez? You'll find both, though purists say that Fez is the red hat with the tassel. I resist buying one. The tea glasses and silver pot are plenty. Fès has that captivating sense of being at a crossroads: of cultures and of time.

Getting there

There are twice-weekly direct flights to Fès-Saïa Airport from London Gatwick with Air Arabia (airarabia.com), and with Ryanair (ryanair.com) from Stanstead. Rooms at the Riad Fès start from €210 (riadfes.com), and at Hotel Sahrai from €180 (hotelsahrai.com).

When to go

Milder winters and deliciously warm springs and autumns make Fès a perfect shoulder season spot. In mid-winter, temperatures hover around 18-20 degrees, but plummet after dark. Summer can be uncomfortably hot, so February to late April is an ideal slot for a break, as is October-November. Extend your visit with day trips to nearby Volubilis and Moulay Idriss: an epic Roman ruin, and a picturesque hill town. Or move on to the beaches at Tangier or Rabat to make a week of it.

Topics: Magazine Unesco Fès Morocco

READ MORE

» The unlikely love that blossomed between me and my múnteor

Reproduced by Gorkana under licence from the NLA (newspapers), CLA (magazines), FT (Financial Times/ft.com) or other copyright owner. No further copying (including printing of digital cuttings), digital reproduction/forwarding of the cutting is permitted except under licence from the copyright owner. All FT content is copyright The Financial Times Ltd.

- » Index: What's hot and what's not this week
- » Why I love ... BodyPump
- » Crispy Parmesan cauliflower
- » Aran Islands: A tour for food lovers

+

MORE LIKE THIS

Stories and views that matter to you. Subscribe.

MORE FROM THE IRISH TIMES

Food & Drink

Oranges or apples: Why is one so much worse for the planet?

Film

The 10 best films of 2019 so far

Books

A book containing tampons becomes a bestseller

Fashion

New York's finest: 108TheStore

SPONSORED »

Expert Electrical: keeping pace with Ireland's appetite for tech and devices

R&D in medicine: changing patients' lives

Grant Thornton's Status Go campaign channels agility to amplify its edge

MyLife: get fitter with friends with Irish Life's new coaching app

ADVERTISEMENT

YOUR COMMENTS

Sign In

We reserve the right to remove any content at any time from this Community, including without limitation if it violates the Community Standards. We ask that you report content that you in good faith believe violates the above rules by clicking the Flag link next to the offending comment or by filling out this form. New comments are only accepted for 3 days from the date of publication.

Subscriber Only »

'I'm in love with my wife's sister and want to tell her'

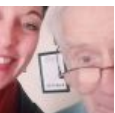

How cyclists' videos can help convict dangerous drivers

Barrow's Keep, Co Kilkenny: Book a late lunch in this perfect riverside location

Most Read in Life & Style

- 1 Oranges or apples: Why is one so much worse for the planet?
- 2 'My boys aren't a consolation prize – they're equally as precious as their sister'
- 3 What sold for €450k and less in Rialto, Terenure, Killiney and Leixlip
- 4 'We'll fix it' parents do their children no favours
- 5 The unlikely love that blossomed between me and my múinteoir
- 6 Irish or Finnish wedding? Dilemma of getting married in his home country or mine

7 First year in secondary school: a survival guide

8 24 pretty and practical pieces to pack for your summer holidays

9 Let the children play: the secret to Finnish education

10 Don't depend on the summer sunshine to arrive before getting off the couch

Real news has value SUBSCRIBE

SUBSCRIBE | ABOUT US | POLICY & TERMS

© 2019 THE IRISH TIMES